The New President of the United States of America

The challenge of healing the nation and the world

Regardless which US Presidential Candidate wins the November 08, 2016 US Presidential Elections the new POTUS should have the capability to rise to the major challenge of healing the nation and the world.

The two major candidates competing to the most influential political office in the world are both coming from a background best described as living in a world of splendid isolation separate from the common citizen and voter.

November 09, 2016 hopefully provides the US and the world a clear election result and an end to the, for various different reasons, unutterably unsavory campaigns of Hilary Clinton and Donald Trump.

One of the two shall be the next President of the United States of America and it should be expected that either of them should immediately leave the spectacle of the campaign trail behind and professionally sober up for this highest office she or he will occupy, define and shape for history to come.

Whoever the successor of Barack Obama will be shall no longer only be judged from the media and voters but will have to live up to political realities and ultimately history itself.

President Barack Obama has managed his two terms in office in general with high domestic and international approval rates leaving to his legacy no scandals and a somewhat unspectacular tenure in increasingly complex times.

Respecting US History, the Constitution and the Institution of the Presidency the new President would be well advised to put emphasis on lowering proliferation of confrontations and negatives both domestically as well as internationally.

Instead of continuing fighting ideological battles and wars it is the right time and probably more effective to concentrate on smart decisions and making deals which target first of all the well being of people in the US and abroad likewise. The new President domestically should concentrate on US demography and invest especially into increasing unity of the country and its people by ensuring liberal traditions and better incomes allowing new growth of the middle class. Abroad the US for still long time to come anyway shall remain the global lead-nation but it should be wise to invest more in diplomacy and the better US image as successful role-model state then into doubtful military threats and actions which are always prone to eventually carry more risks than benefits. This does not mean that defense and anti-terror policies should be neglected but the approach could be altered away from the current war and destructive state of mind to gain much more civil society oriented and constructive policies.

Whoever enters the Oval Office Friday January 20, 2017 as new President of the United States of America has a once-in-a-lifetime historic chance to positively surprise America and the international community. For the sake of all of us we can only hope and pray for the goodness of the person charged with the burdens and powers of this outstanding public office. God bless America and all of us. Dirk P. Schneider
